

Editor's Acknowledgments

As the editor of this work I owe much to the support and encouragement of many individuals.

I am very grateful to professors Paul Stewart and Weston Cook, Jr. for thoughtfully reviewing early drafts of the editorial text and patiently addressing my many questions. Their vast knowledge of the late medieval Spanish and Maghribi military systems respectively was invaluable in providing a synthesis of current knowledge on the 1481-92 War of Granada. I am indebted to John Sloan and Curt C. Johnson, who reviewed draft material pertaining to the broader aspects of Western military history, and who made available the Xenophon Group's database on military history for use in the notes and Glossary.

I am also very grateful for the assistance of Phyllis Cassler and staff of the Van Noy Library, Fort Belvoir, Virginia. Their diligent professionalism permitted my access to many books of limited availability in the United States, and tested the inter-library loan system to its limits. Certainly my gratitude extends to the many libraries that cooperated and responded as part of the OCLC network. Recognition is due to José Paláu who assisted me in performing follow-up research in Spain, and to Donald J. LaRocca of The Metropolitan Museum of Art, Arms and Armour Section, New York, who reviewed and commented upon armament portions of the draft text. I owe much to the many individuals who so graciously assisted me at various museums in Spain and at academic libraries in the United States. An indispensable contribution has been provided by Kate Ryle, who studiously read several drafts, and proposed numerous constructive changes to the text.

In particular, I am most appreciative for the support, encouragement and vital assistance provided by Barbara, my wife and companion in the pursuit of the study of history.

Albert D. McJoynt
Mount Vernon, Virginia
1995